Interstellar Comet 3I/ATLAS may have a course-altering encounter before heading to the Gemini Constellation.

A new pre-print paper suggests that our latest interstellar visitor, comet 3I/ATLAS, may be headed for one final close encounter before it departs our Solar System in 2026. The paper, which focuses on dynamical simulations of the object, also attempts to look at the course 3I/ATLAS will take on departure, and the path that brought it to us. While much has been made of (highly dubious and unnecessary) claims that 3I/ATLAS is an interstellar spacecraft, that is not the case. But that doesn't make it uninteresting; we are still talking about a visitor from another star, which could give us clues about the environment in another part of the Milky Way.

Verstappen wins Formula 1 race in Las Vegas as Norris and Piastri are disqualified

Max Verstappen won the event for the second time in three years to close the gap on Norris to just 42 points with two races remaining. But three hours after the race concluded, the FIA summoned McLaren to see the stewards for failing inspection. The measured thickness on the skid wear on the McLarens failed to meet the minimum thickness requirements. Skid wear is the wear on the protective plank on the underside of the cars, and Lewis Hamilton was disqualified for the same infraction earlier this year.

Fox with a pipe around its neck treated and released by Delco dog rescue group

Since at least October, Good Boy Dog Recovery, an animal rescue group has been in search of a red fox with a plastic drainage pipe stuck around its neck, in the hopes of freeing the animal from it's dilemma.

And, on Sunday morning, on social media, the rescue group announced that it has successfully tracked, trapped, treated and released the animal back into the wild. The rescue group said that the fox, which it had nicknamed "Sly," had been spotted roaming around Broomall in Delaware County several times ahead of its eventual rescue. The animal, organizers said, was captured on Saturday evening.
